CHANGING PITCHING STYLE
MADE GEORGE CHALMERS.
When He Disposed With Windup He Lost Willness.

While Grover Alexander of the Philadelphia Athletics was attracting the attention of the baseball world early this season there was another young pitcher on the way to the big leagues of the New York State League, who was busy changing his style of delivery and thus keeping his light under a bushel. This was George Chalmers, likewise a right-hander, who now has a record of 10-10 in 20 games, most as much attention as that of Alexander the Great.

Strangely enough, it was Pat Moran, the old club catcher, to whom Alexander attributes much of his success, who suggested to Chalmers a change from his long swinging wind-up to a position with the ball in front of his chest with a turn for delivery. This suggestion was made to correct a tendency toward wildness and also to enable the youngster to watch the bases better.

When Chalmers had mastered his new delivery and began to win games, Alexander had become a headliner, and his team's success was due to his pitching by many fans. But when Chalmers' record showed eight victories out of his first ten games, the manager of the team, the Phillies, were making for the pennant—a fight sadly handicapped by Manager Dooley's injury.

Chalmers is one of the few foreign-born players in the majors. He was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, June 27, 1888, but removed to New York City, where his family still lives, before he was two years old. He attended the public schools and learned to play ball on the streets of Manhattan Island.

Chalmers does not depend on any one style of ball in his tail end, but tries to "mix 'em up" to puzzle the opposing batsmen. Personally he is a likeable sort of chap, without a trace of the swelled head which sometimes affects successful youngsters. He stands up well in his tail end, and is a great believer in keeping in condition, and during the winter months he is at Heckler's gymnasium in New York, a place patronized largely by business men. There his favorite mode of exercise is tossing a six pound medicine ball, as he thinks the heavier balls too much of a strain for regular exercise.

CONNIE MACK'S THEORY.
Wallop Tailenders and Split Even With Big Fellows to Win.

Assurance is given that Connie Mack's theory of winning a championship is to hit in the tail end and to a frazzle and break even with the big fellows, is a mistake is made. Mack seems to be a little off in which all managers work. Turn your eyes over the baseball pages of other years and note whether any manager has ever won a pennant by this method. Who has been successful has been in the habit of coddling a tail end club if he could get it.

There have been some who were foolish enough to rap the New York club right and left, when they made some progress in the race for a pennant, because "New York won from Brooklyn and Boston." Strangely enough one writer who made this assertion forgot that the club in his own city—a club, by the way, which was a championship contender—had won as many games from Boston and Brooklyn as New York. Years ago there was a club in Boston which won championships, quite frequently. Also there was a club in Baltimore which did not suffer the fate of never being heard that either of these clubs ever spared the feelings of the lowly tail enders. They went after them for all they were worth.

After giving the subject a little thought it is not easy to see wherein the Mack theory is wonderfully new. Candidly, Connie was never known to permit anything to get away in baseball on which he could place his genial old paw.

In connection with the discovery of the Mack method, the writer also made that many a team has lost a pennant because it failed to play as well against a weak team as against a strong rival. Doubtful. Very doubtful. Frequently there are teams which look quite powerless against the New York Yankees, but when the Yankees are in the bottom of the race, that tells more of the tale, added to the fact that the Yankees are so-called tail end teams can bat the pitchers of the first division teams with a great deal of assurance.
